Once again, the scientists responsible for Squiddo have decided to put him through yet another one of their ethically questionable experiments.

Because he is considered neither human nor animal, he is currently classified as lab property and thus has little to no way of protection against his owner's terrible mix of sadism and morbid curiosity.

Squiddo has always been deathly afraid of cockroaches so, of course, that ended up being exactly what they chose to torment him with this time.

Honestly, it's a bit surprising they hadn't done something like that even earlier.

They always come up with excuses for the atrocities they inflict upon him and this time it's no different.

Officially, the purpose of this "experiment" is to find a way to "cure" the half-squid's extreme aversion to cockroaches. In truth, however, they just want to see the poor guy in distress once again.

Before starting, they make sure their subject is completely immobilized and barely able to move.

This, the scientists say, is to prevent Squiddo from accidentally hurting the poor bugs or making them scared, causing them to flee.

That would certainly ruin the torture sessio- I mean, the experiment!

He wants to beg for them to stop but he can't even do that due to the mouth contraption forcefully put on him. .

All he can do is lay there, terrified of the creature being held centimeters away from his most sensitive and intimate parts, hoping those men have at least a shred of mercy for once in their lives.

As usual, it seems they don't.
